Kennedy Center Launches The Cartography Project: Multi-Season National Symphony Orchestra & Washington National Opera Commissioning Initiative to Map Black Dignity as a Cultural Response to Extrajudicial Violence

Live World Premieres of First Eight Chamber & Vocal Commissions (March 15 & 16), Plus Ten-Part Online Docuseries (Launches Today, February 3)

“It’s about our blind determination to push for something better for ourselves, our communities, and our shared place on this miraculous planet. This is an anthem for that brilliant fire that lives in us all.”

– Jessica Mays, composer commissioned for The Cartography Project

(WASHINGTON)—Launching today as a cornerstone of the Kennedy Center’s 50th anniversary season, The Cartography Project is a major multi-year National Symphony

Orchestra (NSO) and Washington National Opera (WNO) commissioning initiative, conceived by the Center’s Artistic Director & VP of Social Impact Marc Bamuthi Joseph to foreground the phenomenon of race-based violence in the United States by commissioning new chamber and vocal works by creators of color from grieving communities across the nation. Moreover, by considering the broader context of this violence, the project aims to position Black dignity as the prevailing narrative of the African American experience, rather than Black trauma.

For its first installment, The Cartography Project includes eight new commissions. These will receive live world premiere performances from WNO singers and members of the NSO and WNO Orchestra in an evening-length program at Studio K in the Kennedy Center’s new REACH expansion on March 15 and 16. As part of this multimedia event, excerpts from a complementary ten-part docuseries will screen between performances to contextualize each new work. Meanwhile the series’ first four episodes premiere online today (February 3) on the Center’s website and social channels.

An inaugural recipient of the Guggenheim Social Practice initiative, Bamuthi Joseph explains:

“We use maps as connective tissue to mark pathways to freedom and delineate ourselves in space. With The Cartography Project, empathy becomes pedagogy and the sheet music becomes the textbook. We are mapping, figuratively, these incidents of violence but we are also mapping the possibility of who we can be. We are drawing dots – and those dots not only show how to go between but also how to move beyond. Cartography is inspired by the idea that somebody has to chart the beyond – to chart the course forward. Equally important, we knew we couldn’t do this work without engaging some of the families of individuals who have been murdered in the last several years. It was critical that we let them know that we care about them and think of them, not only in connection with this moment in time but also as the true pillars of dignity that these pieces represent.”

As an introduction to the concept of Black dignity and the vital part it plays in this project, Cartography’s first installment features The Road Ahead by the Kennedy Center’s new Composer-in-Residence, 2021 Sphinx Medal of Excellence winner Carlos Simon, written for a text by Bamuthi Joseph, who will perform its spoken word component himself. The NSO has commissioned short chamber works from three up-and-coming composers: Colorado’s Jessica Mays, Cleveland’s Nathaniel Heyder, and Louisville’s Derek Douglas Carter, who honor lives taken in these areas. To complete the project’s first edition, the WNO has commissioned short vocal works from four composer-librettist teams: Baltimore’s Jasmine Barnes and Joshua Banbury; Minneapolis’ Liz Gre and Junauda Petrus-Nasah; the Bay Area’s Jens and

Yasmina Ibsen; and Atlanta’s B.E. Boykin and Brittney Ray Crowell, who pay tribute to lives taken in these cities.

Each of these eight new works forms the basis of one episode of the dedicated new docuseries commissioned for The Cartography Project from filmmaker T.L. Benton, whose documentary We Have the Numbers: Gun Violence in America debuted at the 2019 DC Black Film Festival. Bookended by a prologue and epilogue, the ten-part series will premiere on the Kennedy Center’s website and social channels in the weeks preceding the live events, with the first four episodes premiering today, February 3. Narrative excerpts from the series will also screen between performances at the concerts themselves. A complete online release schedule of the videos is here.

Four more Cartography commissions are set to premiere in future seasons, each deepening the musical and geographical exploration of Black dignity in the face of systemic violence. As an evolving, ongoing initiative that gives contemporary creators the chance to engage with issues of critical social importance, the project is intended as a model for other classical organizations to follow.

WNO General Director Timothy O’Leary says:

“After Bamuthi came to us with this idea, it was clear that The Cartography Project could be an extraordinary chance to serve our community, in this case our national community, to meet a need—probably the most urgent need in our culture today. The arts have always played a part in the quest for justice and emotional connection across our differences. Opera is the combination of words and music to tell a story. In these times, we’re rightly asking ourselves, which story, and who is telling it?”

Gary Ginstling, Executive Director of the NSO, observes:

“Seeing what happened—the rise of the Black Lives Matter movement and the subsequent public response—we at the NSO and the Kennedy Center asked ourselves what role we could play in this watershed moment for the country. The NSO and WNO also saw this project as an opportunity to address a long struggle with diversity on- and off-stage in our field. Additionally, we see this as a springboard for other organizations in the field to think about contemporary art-makers who are consciously engaging social pathology and creating work in that area.”
